WANTED: PROBLEM SOLVERS

MacArthur Foundation has $100 million for a global solution

By Steve Johnson | CHICAGO TRIBUNE

If you've got a big global problem in mind and a good idea for how to solve it, then the MacArthur Foundation may have a little something for you: a $100 million prize.

The Chicago philanthropy on Thursday announced the 100&Change program, planned to award its biggest individual grant yet via a competition in the realms of public-spiritedness and altruism.

As part of the judging, finalists will even be asked to give public talks detailing their ideas, the staid world of philanthropy borrowing from the popularity of public ideas forums such as TED Talks.

100&Change is, the foundation believes, unmatched in the field of giving.

"We don't think there is anything at this level of spending that is open as to problem and solution," said Cecilia Conrad, the MacArthur managing director who is leading the competition. "If we're trying to attract attention, it's to the notions that there are some problems that are solvable. The average foundation grants tend to be too small for solving the problem. This is creating another space."

The competition is wide-open by design, but it does ask would-be grantees to address "a critical problem affecting people, places or the planet," the foundation said. "Competitive proposals will be meaningful, verifiable, durable, and feasible."

"We're agnostic as to what the field is," Conrad said, "but we're looking for a bundle: We want the problem and how the problem can be solved or how a solution might be helped."

And, she added, "it has to be a charitable purpose."

In other words, an idea about reforming soccer rules to make the game more exciting probably isn't going to make the cut. Something about easy water purification, say, or eradication of rabies might.

The program aims to name up to five finalists by next summer and a winner by early 2018 at the latest.

100&Change is an acknowledgment by MacArthur—the 12th-largest U.S. foundation in terms of assets, according to the Foundation Center—that "the foundation doesn't know everything," Conrad said.

It also hopes to address a common problem in funding: Getting the money to take a good, proven idea up to a scale on which it can have significance. And the "transparent" selection process and sharing of submitted ideas, MacArthur hopes, may encourage others to fund some of the concepts that do not win the grant.

The 100&Change grant, scheduled to be awarded every three years, is open to nonprofits, universities or the private sector, MacArthur said.

The grant, to be doled out in three annual chunks, will come from the foundation's annual giving, $231 million in 2014. The money has become available as some other programs have been phased out because of MacArthur's new, tighter focus, said Conrad, including some giving in the areas of housing and in girls' secondary schools worldwide.

Applicants are required to register on the 100andchange.org website by Sept. 2 and complete a "substantive online application" by Oct. 3. A panel of at least 25 judges from outside MacArthur will evaluate the proposals and provide guidance that will let the foundation select up to 10 semifinalists, to be announced in December.

Abstracts of all proposals will be public, the foundation said, as will judges' assessments, and the semifinalists will be helped by experts to refine their ideas—an idea a little like

"We're agnostic as to what the field is but we're looking for a bundle: We want the problem and how the problem can be solved or how a solution might be helped."

— Cecilia Conrad, managing director at the MacArthur Foundation

the business-development reality TV show "Shark Tank."

"We also are asking the semifinalists to show us they have had authentic and substantive engagement with affected communities," rather than "an attempt from some entity to top-down manage a community," Conrad said. And the foundation wants ideas that can work relatively quickly, showing meaningful results within five years.

"This is saying, 'We know people have tested some ideas. Are these results something that can actually be used to have a significant impact?'" she said. "I'm excited to see what people put forth."

How do I get the courage to tell my friend I like her?

Anna Pulley

redeye@redeye-chicago.com

Dear Anna, I'm probably younger than you'd expect, and there is this girl I really like. She is around my age, and we've been friends for a while. The thing is, I haven't told her how I feel about her because I'm worried it'll end our friendship. I've been trying to get the courage to tell her how I feel and trying to find the right time to tell her, but I've been playing these scenarios in my head for what the results might be. I'm just scared. What do you think I should do?—Worried

Dear Worried, Tell her how you feel.

As someone who hits on my friends literally all the time—some of them don't even like women!—I've learned a few insurmountable truths. They are, in no particular order:

- » It hasn't ruined any friendships.
- » It sucks to be rejected, but the shitty feeling doesn't last.
- » If you REALLY like them, hearing a “no” will help you move on.
- » It's always better to find out than to be left wondering “what if...”

These rules have a few caveats. If she has a partner, don't confess your feelings. It's rude, and it puts her in an awkward position. Sure, there's a slim chance she'll leave her partner, but if not, then you risk being shut out because now you're a “threat” to her relationship.

But this doesn't appear to be the case for you, so you're good to go.

It's actually really smart that you're running through scenarios of how she might react. Doing so helps you prepare emotionally for any outcome and makes it less likely that you'll react badly or do/say something you'll regret.

When you do tell her how you feel—and you should do it in person, because it's thoughtful and it's harder for humans to reject other humans when they have to look you in the eye—give yourself a pep talk beforehand. Remind yourself why you're an amazing and thoughtful and confident person whom anyone would be thrilled to date. Repeat it to yourself until you believe it.

Keep the conversation short and HELLA CASUAL, even if you're feeling the opposite. Act like it's no big deal if she says no. (In the grand scheme of things, this is true.) Tell her that you don't want to ruin your friendship, but that you've been having some FEELZ the past few weeks. It's important that you make it seem recent, and not that you've been pining for her for a long time, which might freak her out.

Ask her playfully if she'd be interested in going on one date to see how that might feel. Approach the conversation with curiosity, and not like all your self-esteem hinges upon her saying yes. It's one date, after all, not a marriage proposal. Emphasize the great connection you have and that if she doesn't feel the same way, it's no biggie, you're cool to stay friends. The less pressure she feels, the better.

Good luck, Worried, and remember to embrace your fear. If it's scary, it's almost certainly worth doing.

ANNA WILL BE READING SOME LESBIAN SEX HAikus AND DOING SOME LIVE ADVICE-ING AT WOMEN AND CHILDREN FIRST ON JUNE 16 AND INVITES YOU ALL TO COME!

Approach the conversation with curiosity, and not like all your self-esteem hinges upon her saying yes. It's one date, after all, not a marriage proposal.

CHILLIN' IN AUSTIN

CHICAGO'S CHAZ ORTIZ CHASES
SKATEBOARDING GOLD IN X GAMES

By Chris Sosa | REDEYE

Chaz Ortiz has been competing on his skateboard in the X Games since 2009, though a gold medal still eludes him.

Now 22, the Chicago native will try to improve on last year's silver medal in the Skateboard Street competition this weekend at the X Games in Austin (airing live on ESPN and ABC).

Before he does, Ortiz chatted with RedEye about how he stays in shape, whether he'd skate in the Olympics and his friendship with Lil Wayne.

@REDEYESPORTSCHI | CHSOSA@REDEYECHICAGO.COM

After finishing second in Skateboard Street at the 2015 X Games, how can you reach the top of the medal stand this year?

Just try my best and have fun. That's how it usually works out!

About how many new tricks do you plan to attempt in this year's competition, and can you give us a preview as to what they are?

Chaz Ortiz competes at Street League at UIC Pavilion last year. REDEYE FILE

I'm working on some new stuff. It's good to keep your tricks fresh because people don't expect them and I feel like you get higher scores.

What makes Nyjah Huston, who's won Skateboard Street the past two X Games in Austin, so tough to beat?

He's a really talented and consistent skater; we both have been skating contests for years.

How did your friendship with Lil Wayne develop, and how often do you skate or hang out with him?

Just from skating and seeing him around at Paul Rodriguez's park [in Los Angeles] and the Berrics [a different skate park in L.A.]. ... We just became friends. I haven't seen him in a little while, but we talk.

What other celebrities have you befriended through skateboarding? Has there been anyone you've been surprised to learn has a love of skateboarding?

I feel like skateboarding is a big wave right now; all the rappers are trying to skate. It's cool, it makes [the sport] grow [and] keeps kids out of trouble.

How long do you plan to skate competitively?

As long as my body allows me. [Laughs.]

How important is maintaining one's fitness in your sport, and how do you go about doing that?

I just try to stay healthy. I started boxing, too. I try to stay active on and off the board.

Have you been following skateboarding's push to become an Olympic sport, and are you hoping to compete in the Games one day?

I have not really been following how hard they are pushing the Olympics, but I mean, if I could do it, why not?

First on fresh water.

Emilia after Lou

Emilia Clarke trades dragons for more attainable strength in 'Me Before You'

By Lauren Chval | REDEYE

Emilia Clarke in
"Me Before You"

Emilia Clarke is no stranger to playing a strong woman. Best known for her role as Daenerys Targaryen, Khaleesi and Mother of Dragons on "Game of Thrones," she has liberated cities, brought men to their knees, started fires and emerged from them, untouched.

"You are small men," Daenerys said in a recent episode. "None of you are fit to lead. ... But I am. So I will."

It may seem like Clarke is turning 180 degrees in her latest role as Louisa (or Lou) in the romantic tearjerker "Me Before You," but when she and screenwriter Jojo Moyes sat down with RedEye at the Peninsula Hotel, the 29-year-old actress said the two characters are closer than you might think.

"Daenerys has got the archetypal strength that is incredibly admirable and epic in quality, whereas Lou's strength is so much more attainable.

It's so much more real, and it's strength that we all have within ourselves," Clarke said.

"Even more, there are no dragons protecting her. She just has to be brave. And that is really difficult in day-to-day, modern-day life."

Lou's day-to-day life is in a small English town. Her lower-class family depends on her income, and she gets a job as a caretaker for Will Traynor (Sam Claflin), a quadriplegic injured in a road accident.

The two characters are well-drawn opposites. Will is acidic, proper and wealthy and doesn't appreciate Lou's simplicity, cheerfulness or eccentric personal style. Both are, even after they've warmed to each other, immature and selfish. When Lou finds out that Will had once tried to commit suicide, her initial reaction isn't empathy but distress for her own situation as his caretaker.

"I just think the authenticity is what spoke to me first," Clarke said. "This isn't trying to be perfect with tinsel and fairy dust and all the magic powder that happens in a lot of these kinds of movies. It's much more based in reality, which is a testament to Jojo's perfect writing."

Moyes adapted her 2012 novel of the same name for the script, which is so confident that it's hard to believe "Me Before You" was her first screenwriting attempt.

"The thing that I did which was most useful to me was to get the screenplays of every film that I'd ever loved and dissect them and see what works," Moyes said.

As Clarke said, there's an authenticity to the characters and story of "Me Before You" that isn't typically found in romantic films. Lou and Will both learn from each other, but their relationship doesn't make the impossible possible or even fix each other's flaws.

"I didn't want it to be sentimental," Moyes explained. "I didn't want it to be idealized. I wanted two people who spoke to each other in the way that couples I know speak to each other, which is a wide variety of humor and affection and irritation and bickering and deep, deep love and passion, and all those things can co-exist within a relationship in one day."

Beyond the dynamic of their relationship, Moyes confessed there were other elements of "Me Before You" that took inspiration from her own life. Lou tells Will about her childhood love for a pair of bumblebee tights, and Moyes said she was the original wearer of those. (She also recounted a "toe-curling memory" from the '80s that involved a turquoise pie-crust collar and white cowboy boots.)

"I had a velvet dress with bells in it. So, my parents could hear me wherever I went," Clarke said of her younger self's best fashion moments. "It was a Christmas dress. With bells in it! It was cool at the time, and then after a while it was like, they knew where I was."

There are other moments stolen directly from Moyes' life. Mentioning a particularly bad gift from Lou's boyfriend, Patrick (Matthew Lewis), sent both her and Clarke into fits of giggles.

"No," Moyes said when asked if the scene was inspired from her own life. But then she nodded. "No, no, not at all. Yes."

Clarke admitted there have been a few bad gifts from boyfriends.

"There was one," she said between laughs. "Oh my God. There was one piece of jewelry that like, whew. Yeah. I was very young. We were very young. I'm talking like kid stuff. But it was still ... it had a lot going on."

The two women had a comfortable ease between them, possibly attained from their time together on a press tour, but more likely grounded in a mutual bond and respect for the character, Lou. Clarke has said she has never so immediately identified with a character in a script, and it's easy to see how her expressive features so easily translated to Lou.

"It's really important to me when I write female characters to write women who do stuff instead of buy stuff," Moyes said. "Her goals are not materialistic or finding a man and everything will be OK. That's not her arc in this story. I try to ask myself what my teenage daughter would take from any story that I write. And in this one, I think, 'You know, Lou would be an OK character to end up like.'"

Don't miss the well-written novel behind the movie

By Margaux Henquinet | REDEYE

Don't be fooled by the fact that it's the basis for the first big romantic movie of the summer; "Me Before You" is no simple, weepy beach read. It's a well-crafted, thought-provoking story about love in the face of challenges, about how people can change one another, about taking control of one's own life.

Louisa "Lou" Clark is a quirky young woman who is personable but far from a risk-taker, content with her small life in an English tourist town. After losing her job, she finds herself employed on a six-month contract as a caregiver for Will Traynor, a wealthy former businessman and adventure junkie who is now a quadriplegic. She's charged with watching over him and encouraged to cheer him up, which at first proves difficult, but she persists, and a friendship begins to form.

Then comes the big reveal: Will, tired of living with pain, dependency, the threat of fatal illness and a life so generally different from his old one, has decided to end his life at an assisted suicide clinic. He promises his parents six months, then they are expected to take him there, a plan they agree to but desperately hope he will change his mind about. And thus begins Lou's quest to convince him his life is worth living, through a series of adventures, experiences and emotions. It's a roller coaster, but they stick together, growing ever closer, and Lou finds herself being changed, too.

"Me Before You" takes a while to get going, as Moyes' writing is full of description and little side stories, but once the plot kicks in, the stakes develop and the characters come clearly into focus, it becomes a can't-put-it-down page-turner. Some plotlines drag—Lou sticks with her ill-suited boyfriend wayyyyy too long—but Moyes works in enough surprises in both plot and style to balance everything out. Though it's Lou and Will's story, the other characters are well-drawn and mostly likable, especially Lou's family members, all of whom have big personalities. And get ready for feels: It's not as weepy as, say, "The Fault in Our Stars," but there are tear-jerking, heartbreaking moments, all of which ring true and are not gimmicky.

Again, "Me Before You" is not a simple beach read; it is, after all, a book whose main conflict is a potential assisted suicide. The book and film have drawn strong criticism from people with disabilities who say the story perpetuates harmful ideas about disability and suicide; Moyes has said it is "about one man and the personal choices he makes for himself, not a comment about people with disabilities in general," according to Canada's CBC News. It's a tricky subject to build a book around, to say the least.

But the story overall is gripping and well-written, one that will stick with you. And definitely worth reading, star-studded movie or not.

Emilia Clarke and Sam Claflin in 'Me Before You'

'Me Before You' will earn your tears

Lauren Chval

» @lchval

Tear-jerking love stories often hinge on one-dimensional elements designed to force as much crying as possible. Two perfect people destined to be together, if only cancer or Alzheimer's or class differences hadn't gotten in the way.

If they have flaws, they complement each other's, or, even better, their love can cure such pesky side effects of humanity.

The problem with this familiar formula is that it never delves into the complexities of life or people. Identity and selfishness and insecurity—in addition to circumstances—don't render real love stories in black and white. So when a film decides to actually play in that gray area, it's hard not to take notice.

"Me Before You," adapted from the 2012 novel by Jojo Moyes, opens with successful businessman Will Traynor (Sam Claflin) getting struck by a motorcycle. Will rides a motorbike himself, jumps from cliffs and generally seeks out extremes, so the fact that he becomes a quadriplegic in a random accident and not as a by-product of his adventurousness speaks to the film's philosophy: Live fully, because you don't know what might happen.

Enter Louisa Clark (Emilia Clarke), or Lou, who needs a job to help out her lower-class parents and her sister, who's going back to school. Will's mother hires her to keep him company, and he immediately resents her presence. She's color to his gray, and unsophisticated to his snobbery, but of course these qualities eventually begin to bring out the best in each of them.

It sounds obvious, but "Me Before You" sidesteps becoming a retelling of "Beauty and the Beast" (a jerk stuck in a castle made better again by a pretty girl) by presenting the self-centeredness and immaturity of both characters and having Will change Lou as much as she changes him. The details of their lives are revealed with confident restraint instead of through painful monologues or voiceovers. Clarke and Claflin both turn in acutely human performances, rounding out their characters and sharing palpable chemistry. At the risk of sounding very British, it's all lovely.

But what makes the film special is its refusal to buy into the trope that love makes everything better. It doesn't. And how could it? Lou's love can't heal a spinal cord. Life keeps going after the credits roll, and "Me Before You" makes no apologies for that.

The movie isn't perfect. Lou's personal trainer boyfriend, Patrick (Matthew Lewis), is horrifically flat and hangs around way longer than makes sense. A few lines of dialogue like "You take care of him, he's a good one" missed the memo about avoiding cheesy clichés, and there's an odd thread of misogyny in Lou's family that's never really addressed. But flaws aside, "Me Before You" is quietly funny and sexy and, above all else, feels real. It's the rare movie where your tears are actually earned.

'Popstar' nails it: Smart, funny and heartwarming

Lauren Chval

» @lchval

If you're not immediately familiar with the comedy trio The Lonely Island, maybe you'll recognize some of their work. Did you ever happen to catch one of those "Saturday Night Live" digital shorts? Does the phrase "Dick in a Box" jog your memory?

Yeah, it's those guys. Andy Samberg, Akiva Schaffer and Jorma Taccone of "SNL" fame are back with the feature-length "Popstar: Never Stop Never Stopping." The title bears an intentional resemblance to "Justin Bieber: Never Say Never," as the mockumentary follows the rise and fall of pop star Conner4Real (Samberg) after he parts ways with his boy band The Style Boyz (Schaffer and Taccone, who also co-directed).

Considering The Lonely Island is known for five-minute bursts of absurdist comedy, it's easy to assume that "Popstar" would consist of a half-baked plot and increasingly ridiculous jokes that eventually run out of steam. Instead, what we're given is a hilarious parody of celebrity, full of sharp commentary and dialogue. Even more impressive is the genuinely affecting, if obvious, story of friendship woven in between the jokes.

That isn't to say that "Popstar" is above immature humor; there are two actual, physical dick jokes, one of which is so unpleasant that it's clear the trio hasn't lost their desire to push boundaries. But lines such as "USA Today, the most respected newspaper in the world" or "You look like Nazi propaganda" show that "Popstar" isn't peddling one kind of humor.

Even the cameos (which are countless and inspire constant giggles of recognition) are used with cleverness. Justin Timberlake plays Conner's personal chef, and as he sings to himself while chopping vegetables, the room tells him to be quiet: "Leave the singing to the professionals!" As Conner performs one of his hits, "So Humble," the camera cuts to Mariah Carey, who confesses that she instantly connected with that song.

Schaffer, Taccone and Samberg have the magical chemistry of guys who actually have known one another since childhood, but even the other two major players, Tim Meadows as Conner's manager and Sarah Silverman as his publicist, are so consistently great that it feels like the gang has been together for a while.

It helps that "Popstar" is only 86 minutes and doesn't try to overstay its welcome. A few cameos fall flat (not even Bill Hader can make the guitar roadie bit work), but otherwise, the film manages to nail the trifecta of smart, funny and heartwarming. The fact that it's basically inspired by Justin Bieber makes that feat all the more remarkable.

Kimski seamlessly blends Polish and Korean cuisines in Bridgeport

By Michael Nigrant | FOR REDEYE

If you've ever wondered what Logan Square or Wicker Park looked like before hipsters, all you have to do is spend some time in the neighborhood surrounding Kimski, a new Korean-Polish fusion counter at Maria's Packaged Goods & Community Bar in Bridgeport. There, you'll find Section 8 housing, a metalworking shop, cops, politicians, blue collars and white collars—a true-blue Chicago neighborhood bursting at the seams.

If Bridgeport had a mayor, the role would be split between brothers and Maria's owners Ed and Mike Marszewski. Half-Polish, half-Korean, the Marszewskis ran a regular KoPo (Korean-Polish) night at the bar where they served Polish sausages topped with kimchi kraut. That's where chef Won Kim—a recent champion of Food Network's "Cutthroat Kitchen," local urban muralist and longtime pop-up restaurant contributor—met Ed and the crew.

"I liked to make a regular habit of what I call getting 'Maria's drunk.' You know, totally blasted out, where you make a lot of bad decisions on the way home," Kim said. "One night I was helping out and started plating the sausages all arty and in smaller portions to prevent all the drunk people from taking three sausages at a time. That's when Ed and I started talking about his idea for Kimski."

The scene

While Maria's is a perfect blend of old-man dive bar meets darkly lit Prohibition-era speakeasy, Kimski is an airy warehouse-like space outfitted with bright yellow industrial stools, a sleek wood bar and mod-style booths. You'll find some of Maria's grizzled regulars, but there's also a stroller or two accompanying young families.

The food

It's rare to find something truly original in Chicago, land of all restaurants. But Kim has managed to create a concept that didn't already exist. His food is its own thing, a true 50-50 situation that your babcia (Polish grandma) or halmoni (Korean grandma) would appreciate. Maria's Standard ($8) is the perfect example: a fat, smoky Polish sausage bursting with garlic and spice that's remixed with a soulful, rice-perfumed, soju-infused mustard and tangy kimchi kraut.

Then there are the vegetarian potskis ($7), aka deep-fried dumplings, which are a cross between a potsticker and pierogi. They're packed with earthy shiitake, zingy sauerkraut and crumbly farmer cheese. Each pocket ends on a creamy note courtesy of smoked soy sauce- and sesame oil-infused sour cream.

Kopo Wangs ($8) are smoked, roasted and deep-fried, and the skin on each piece of poultry is so crisp that it eats like a chicharon or pork rind. The juicy flesh drips in house "AP" sauce made with honey and fizzy fermented gochujang, a lip-smacking spicy red chili paste. While the sauce is distinctly Asian, the chicken is reminiscent of the fussy turkeys my Polish grandparents put on the Thanksgiving table every year.

The bulgogi cheesesteak ($10)—a weekly special made with Kim's mom's marinated grilled ribeye recipe—is very Korean, but skewers less Polish and more Philadelphia with a blanket of Muenster cheese and golden caramelized onions. Instead of insipid green bell peppers, Kim sprinkles the bun-swaddled sandwich with bright, grassy ribbons of shishito pepper. A stroke of gochujang butter puts the whole thing over the top.

The only dish that felt like a stretch in the fusion category was the kimchi fried rice ($7). Technically, the housemade “kraut-chi” adds some Polish flare, but the fried egg, scallion and greens make it a pitch-perfect facsimile of meatless Korean bibimbap.

The drinks

A chalkboard menu lists 24 draft beer choices, an ample selection of lagers, bocks and IPAs from usual local suspects such as Three Floyds Brewing Co. and Goose Island Beer Co. as well many other regional American and European breweries. Still, I stuck with the sodas, which included a sweet, pecan-infused root beer from Fest Cola and an elderflower and rose sparkling lemonade (both $1.99 each) that tasted like a refreshing mashup of prosecco and rosé spiked with lemon.

Bottom line

Kimski’s KoPo cuisine is something you’ve probably never seen or tasted in Chicago. Throw in a patio-outfitted dining space and a killer beer list and you’ve got the hottest place to be this summer.

Chicago neverias offer unique flavors

By Bill Daley | CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Vanilla is gonna seem, well, vanilla after you've been to one of Chicago's neverias, or Mexican-style ice cream stores, where the roster of flavors might include cheese, pine nut and even tequila. The possibilities are astounding—and delicious.

"If it can be churned, you can bet that it's an ice cream flavor somewhere in Latin America," wrote Sandra A. Gutierrez in her 2013 book "Latin American Street Food."

And ice cream is just part of the story: You can also order fruit or cream ice pops (paletas) and manguanadas, made with sorbet, chopped mango, lime juice and chamoy sauce, a bracingly sweet, sour, tangy and salty sauce.

Gutierrez, who grew up in the United States and Guatemala, recalls chuckling when she saw Baskin-Robbins advertising 31 flavors. "That's nothing," she said, noting that a Mexican ice cream store can have hundreds of flavors, from cucumber to squash flower to avocado, which gives the ice cream an extra creaminess.

"We're just not shy when it comes to the ingredients," explained Pati Jinich, author of the new cookbook "Mexican Today" and star of "Pati's Mexican Table," a public-television cooking series.

Two of our favorite neverias to dip into are La Michoacana Premium (lamichoacana premium.com) a neon-lit showstopper at 1855 S. Blue Island Ave. with servers who patiently explain the flavors and offer free spoonfuls; and Paletaria Las Delicias de Michoacan, 6649 N. Clark St., a friendly, more modest operation with freezer display cases full of frozen treats. How to tackle all that variety if you're a newbie?

Just jump in: "If it's sweet, it's creamy and it's cold, order it," Gutierrez said. "It's ice cream."

SIP AND SAVOR

DROP THE FROZEN MARGARITA—THERE ARE WAY BETTER DRINKS TO PAIR WITH TACOS

By Joseph Hernandez | CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Margarita pitchers saturated with sugar or watery lager dressed up with lime are too often the typical go-tos when you're meeting friends for tacos. Especially when we're talking about a good taco—a soft, elastic tortilla stuffed with savory protein and bright salsa, sprinkled with cotija cheese, cilantro or crunchy radishes—you deserve something better.

Whether you're classing it up with wine, playing it cool with something nonalcoholic or indulging in tequila's smokier sibling, mezcal, up your taco drinking game with these drinks at these four spots.

Beer at Cruz Blanca

904 W. Randolph St. 312-733-1975

Rick Bayless' newest spot is everything a taco lover could want: flame-kissed meat, house-made tortillas and a slew of golden beers that are as much an event as the primal plating of tacos. Headed up by brewer Jacob Sembrano, the brewpub is home to an interesting lineup of nontraditional European-style beers, in particular three iterations of the light French biere de garde. The La Guardia Ambar—an amber-hued brew made from Mexican hominy—goes particularly well with the carne asada, thanks to its medium-body, healthy suds and toasty, nutty notes. You won't find IPAs on this menu, but the dry-hopped Smoke Alley, a wheat ale that's light in body with a hit of smoke and hops, is a fine match for your tacos too.

Wine at Summer House Santa Monica

1954 N. Halsted St. 773-634-4100

With its clean-yet-boho, Cali-cool vibe, Summer House serves light, beach-friendly fare that evokes the Golden State's rightful obsession with freshness. On the taco front, you'll find line-caught mahi mahi served with cumin-scented rice, charred tomato salsa, guacamole and tortillas. This dish gives the humble taco a deliciously modern upgrade, so put down that Dos XX and listen up: Wine director Ryan Arnold suggests two wine pairings for the textured, meaty mahi mahi. "I'd seek out wines that are low alcohol, crisp and citrusy, and play a nice supporting role to really let the fish shine." Arnold's Old World pick, Ameztot's txakoli, hails from northern Spain. "Minerality, salt and citrus with a little effervescence make this one of my favorite pairings." For a taste of Cali, Arnold also offers up a sauvignon blanc from Stolpman Vineyards, from Santa Barbara's Ballard Canyon region.

Mezcal at La Mez Agave Lounge

108 W. Kinzie St. 312-329-9555

Mezcal has been having a moment, with the opening of a few cocktails dens dedicated to the smoky spirit. La Mez, in the basement of River North's Mercadito, boasts more than 75 styles of the agave-based spirit. Start with the pollo tacos (chicken marinated with garlic and the Mexican herb epazote, topped with corn hash, onions, a poblano-tomatillo mojo sauce, avocado and shallots), and pair it with a funky cocktail from Dylan Stewart, head mixologist for both spaces. He infuses Peloton de la Muerte mezcal with dried chanterelle mushrooms and plantains for four hours, then mixes the infusion with Lillet Blanc, honey, lemon and celery bitters, yielding a complex drink that is earthy and smoky, a perfect foil to the sweet corn in the taco.

Agua fresca at Antique Taco

1360 N. Milwaukee Ave. 773-687-8697

Want a nonalcoholic option? Light and fruity, agua fresca is the answer to salty, savory tacos. Translated simply as "fresh water," it's a blend of pureed fruit, water, sugar and a hit of citrus that's popular throughout Mexico and Central America, though you're just as likely to find it at taco stands and food carts in Chicago, Los Angeles and New York. At Antique Taco in Wicker Park, seasonal agua fresca (right now, blackberry) is always on the menu, with a bright, healthy dose of lemon juice to cut through fatty carnitas or lift up earthy cumin-dusted lamb tacos.

THE DIGIT

7 That's the number of episodes the next season of "Game of Thrones" might have. Vanity Fair asked Jack Bender, who directed that traumatic episode "The Door," if he was coming back next season, and he replied that he didn't know, saying, "They're only doing seven [episodes], and they've got their regulars who have done it forever." All men must die, and so must all television shows.

A show for preschoolers ... and us

Just after the official announcement of the new "Mary Poppins" reboot, Netflix has announced that the O.G. Mary, Julie Andrews, is getting her own Netflix kids show, "Julie's Greenroom." She'll star as Mrs. Julie, "a Mr. Rogers-like figure with a flair for the performing arts," and will be joined by a bunch of puppets and celebrity guests including Ellie Kemper, Tituss Burgess and Idina Menzel, according to vulture.com. The show, due out in early 2017, is supposed to be for preschoolers, but screw that, we need our grandmother-figure fix.

Sorry, Taylor

In case you missed it, Taylor Swift and Calvin Harris have split after 15 months of dating. Unnamed sources are saying all kinds of things about the breakup—like that Harris ended the relationship because he was "intimidated" by Swift's success, and that it "wasn't a shock" for her because they had ongoing problems, according to people.com—but we're sure we'll get all the details in her next album. Love is dead.

Introducing Captain Marvel?

Recent Oscar winner Brie Larson is in early talks to star as Captain Marvel in an upcoming standalone film, according to variety.com. The status of the negotiations is unknown, but Variety reports that sources have said Larson is the studio's first choice, and that "she's leaning toward playing the part." Fingers crossed!

Don't go!

Lin-Manuel Miranda plans to exit the stage of his Broadway smash hit "Hamilton" on July 9, according to thr.com. That's when many cast members' contracts are up, including Miranda's, and he has told confidants he'll be leaving to work on other projects, THR reported. So, you only have a little over a month to shell out your life's savings to see the original cast perform. Can you hear the cries of despair from theater and history geeks the world over?
